VOYAGE TO ONESELF

Series of four TV programmes on human rights

Part 1: Against the Tide

The objective of this first programme of the series is to shed a strong light on the significance of human rights as ethical principles, i.e., as principles for action, as well as to show what a single individual, if aware of this significance, can do for the protection of human rights even in war which is the total rejection of human rights.

Part 2: Human Dignity: Whose Dignity?

The objective of this second programme of the series is to shed a strong light on the content of the concept of dignity, to distinguish it from concepts with which is usually confused, to show the point of its connection with human rights and to underline the fact that we give damage to, or protect, our human dignity not with what we suffer, but by what ourselves do.

Part 3: The State: What for?

The objective of this third programme of the series is to help us reflect on the widespread acceptance that human rights exist in order to protect the individual from the State and to call our attention to a different approach to the State as a human, legal institution whose raison d'être is to protect the human rights of those who live in its territory; in other words to protect individual from each other and to administrate what is public in accordance with human rights and their implications in the existing conditions of each state.

Part 4: Tolerance and the Limits of Toleration

The objective of this fourth programme of the series is to shed a strong light on the concept of tolerance as a personal attitude and as a principle in the arrangement and administration of public affairs, as well as to draw attention to two possible criteria concerning what should not be the object of toleration.
